thinking that some kind of help is there which as a matter of fact is not. It is like having ten lifeboats on a ship but all of them leak.

SENATOR HABERMAN: Senator Sieck.

SENATOR SIECK: Mr. President and members of the body, I am going to agree with Senator Chambers on this particular issue. I have noticed ~~that~~...I am on that study committee with the Judiciary Committee to look into these very things that he is talking about. We need to look at this and we know that we have a problem, and if we can't do it, let's get rid of it. But at the present time I think we should finance what we have got and take care of the bills that are coming before us. This is the only thing at the present time that we can help the victims and we have been disregarding them many, many years. And this not only takes care of the wealthy but the poor. Normally, if a wealthy man is criminalized, he will just say, well, skip it, and I think that is wrong. We should help each and every one. There is a lot of poor individuals that go by the wayside and they are not helped and I feel we need to help them. So I vote for the override of the Governor's veto on this particular issue.

I am for a society that helps those who cannot help themselves or who are in unfortunate situations, but I do believe as a matter of equity that we should treat all different kinds of people who have misfortunes basically the same. If you are born into a family and the father leaves the family and there is no support, if your income level is so low that you cannot otherwise get along, we help those spouses and we help those children. We do it through our Aid to Dependent Children. And if somebody is walking down the street and is struck by lightning and can't afford the medical bills, we help them. We help them through our Medicaid program and through our medical programs. If someone is stricken with disease, all these things through no fault of their own, we help them too, but we help them based on financial need. Crime victims I also believe should be helped, but I think that they should be helped on the basis of financial need, and I think that they will be helped under our current
